These diseases are also common in populations from regions of the world where these infections are endemic. These findings have relevance to other situations where immunodeficiency is associated with impaired cellular immunity. The major goal of the present investigation is to test the hypothesis that immunodeficiency has a causal role in the development of some cases of systemic mycoses.

To this end, immunologic parameters of patients with acute or chronic mycoses will be compared with those of patients without these infections. The hypothesis that immune deficiency is associated with the development of cryptococcosis will be tested by studying various aspects of cellular immunity in patients with cryptococcosis.

To test the hypothesis that T cell abnormalities play a role in the pathogenesis of coccidioidomycosis, mixed lymphocyte responses to antigens of Histoplasma capsulatum will be studied in patients with coccidioidomycosis. The contribution of humoral factors in coccidioidomycosis will be tested by studying the C3 component of complement and the ability of serum to inhibit the adherence of yeast cells to monolayers of target cells.

Finally, attempts will be made to isolate antigens of fungal pathogens from patients with systemic mycoses in order to study the nature of the antigens that are potentially responsible for the immunologic abnormalities associated with these infections.
