1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to a spark plug for internal combustion engines, more particularly to a spark plug having a ground electrode with a surface treatment, to which a high voltage is applied to improve the ignition properties of the ground electrode.

2. Related Art In a spark plug, such as a conventional spark plug having a ground electrode and a center electrode, a section in which the ground electrode and the center electrode are attached to each other is provided with a ground electrode insulator interposed between the ground electrode and the center electrode, and a section in which the ground electrode and the center electrode are attached to each other is provided with a central electrode insulator interposed between the ground electrode and the center electrode. In this case, the spark plug is provided with an insulator to which a high voltage of about 10 kV is applied to ignite a mixture gas. However, the conventional spark plug has a problem that since the surface of the ground electrode is not processed, only a low potential of about 2 kV or less can be applied to the surface. To address the above problem, Japanese Patent Application Publication No. 2008-100401 (JP-A-2008-100401) describes a spark plug including a ground electrode having a surface treatment with a high hardness. According to this conventional spark plug, even when a high voltage is applied to the ground electrode, the ground electrode has a satisfactory initial spark characteristic, and it is possible to reduce the damage of the ground electrode by cutting of a spark discharge. In the spark plug described in JP-A-2008-100401, the ground electrode is formed of a noble metal alloy of one or more metals selected from
