Q: If we can create our own minimal space station then why are we still having to use rockets? If we can create our own minimal space station then why are we still having to use rockets? Why did we create the space shuttle or the space station? Is it because they are cheaper or does it have something to do with fuel? A: The entire question is not what you think it is. You are asking two questions: Why are we still having to use rockets? Why did we create the space shuttle or the space station? Here are the responses to these two questions. The Shuttle was/is a rocket, but it also was/is a space station, so you can't really answer why we still use rockets by starting with the answer to the second question. In both cases, it was to go to places that you couldn't go on a rocket. The Shuttle went to the Moon, and the ISS is somewhere in low Earth orbit. While orbiting around the Earth, an object in low Earth orbit is constantly moving. It's not like a car that is going in a straight line. While you are in low Earth orbit, you constantly need to re-orient to the planets. You can't stay in one place. With the Shuttle, you would be constantly re-orienting with its payload, which was too large for the Shuttle to carry. The ISS can be constantly re-oriented with the astronauts. I hope this helps.
